

So Greek: Confessions of a Conservative Leftie

I'm a conservative who believes in social justice. I know, it's a bit of a contradiction in terms. But it's who I am.

I grew up in a Greek-American family in the suburbs of Chicago. My parents were both immigrants, and they instilled in me a strong work ethic and a deep love of this country.

I went to college at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, where I studied political science. It was there that I first started to question my conservative upbringing.

I took a course on social justice, and it opened my eyes to the plight of the poor and disenfranchised. I learned about the systemic racism that exists in our society, and I was horrified.

I couldn't believe that I had been so blind to these injustices. I had always thought of myself as a compassionate person, but I realized that I had a lot to learn.

After college, I moved to Washington, D.C., to work in politics. I worked for a conservative think tank, and I quickly learned the ropes of the political game.

But I also saw firsthand how the system was rigged against the poor and the working class. I saw how corporations and special interests had bought and paid for our government.

I couldn't stomach it anymore. I quit my job and started working for a nonprofit organization that fights for social justice.

It's not always easy being a conservative leftie. I often feel like I'm not welcome in either world.

But I believe that it's important to stand up for what I believe in. I believe in a society where everyone has a fair shot, regardless of their race, religion, or sexual orientation.

I believe in a government that works for the people, not the powerful.

I'm not afraid to stand up for what I believe in, even if it means standing alone.

If you're a conservative who believes in social justice, I encourage you to join me. Together, we can make a difference.
