The BTK Strangler

The BTK Strangler was a serial killer who terrorized the city of Wichita, Kansas, from 1974 to 1991. He murdered 10 people, and he left behind a trail of cryptic clues that taunted the police and the public.

The BTK Strangler's first victim was a 10-year-old girl named Josephine Otero. He broke into her home and strangled her to death. Over the next 17 years, he would kill nine more people, including two children. He would often torture his victims before killing them, and he would sometimes leave behind messages written in blood.

The BTK Strangler's reign of terror came to an end in 2005, when he was arrested and sentenced to life in prison. He was identified through a DNA

The Investigation

The investigation into the BTK Strangler case was one of the most complex and challenging in Kansas history. The police were baffled by the killer's methods and his cryptic clues. They interviewed hundreds of suspects, but they were unable to identify him.

In 2004, the BTK Strangler sent a letter to a local television station. In the letter, he claimed to be responsible for the murders of 10 people. He also included a series of cryptic clues that he challenged the police to solve.

The police were able to decipher some of the clues, and they were able to narrow down the list of suspects. In 2005, they arrested Dennis Rader, a 60-year-old man who lived in Wichita. Rader confessed to the murders, and he was sentenced to life in prison.

The Dangers of Ignoring the Signs
