On one side was Donald Trump, the incumbent president and a Republican. Trump was a controversial figure, known for his outspokenness and his unorthodox approach to politics. He had alienated many Americans with his divisive rhetoric and his policies, but he also had a loyal following among many white working-class voters.

On the other side was Joe Biden, the former vice president and a Democrat. Biden was a more traditional politician, known for his moderate views and his ability to reach across the aisle. He was seen by many as a safe and experienced choice, but he was also criticized for being too centrist and for lacking the charisma of his opponent.

The election was close, with Trump winning the Electoral College but Biden winning the popular vote. The results were disputed by Trump and his supporters, who alleged widespread voter fraud. However, these allegations were rejected by state and federal officials, and Biden was eventually declared the winner.

The 2020 presidential election was a watershed moment in American history. It exposed deep divisions in the country, and it raised fundamental questions about the future of American democracy.
