Liberty

One of the most fundamental moral values is liberty. Free markets protect liberty by allowing individuals to make their own choices about how to live their lives. They can choose what to buy, what to sell, where to work, and where to live. Big government, on the other hand, restricts liberty by imposing regulations and taxes on individuals and businesses.

For example, the government may require businesses to pay a minimum wage, even if this means that some workers will lose their jobs. The government may also regulate the prices of goods and services, even if this means that consumers will pay more for them.

Equality

Another important moral value is equality. Free markets promote equality by giving everyone the same opportunity to succeed. In a free market, the only thing that matters is how hard you work and how much value you create for others. Everyone has the potential to achieve economic success, regardless of their race, gender, or religion.

Big government, on the other hand, undermines equality by creating a system of winners and losers. The government often gives special privileges to certain groups, such as businesses that donate to political campaigns or unions that support government-mandated benefits.

Prosperity

A third moral value that free markets promote is prosperity. Free markets create wealth by allowing businesses to compete and innovate. When businesses are free to compete, they come up with new products and services that make our lives better.

Big government, on the other hand, stifles prosperity by creating barriers to entry for new businesses. The government also makes it difficult for businesses to innovate by imposing regulations and taxes.

C. Bradley Thompson's book, "Why Free Markets Are Moral and Big Government Isn't," is a must-read for anyone who wants to understand the moral superiority of free markets. Free markets promote liberty, equality, and prosperity, while big government undermines these core moral values. If you want to live in a free and prosperous society, then you need to support free markets.
